Blooms and Bedrock

The flora across the cliff tops in my home, the Blue Mountains, appears to flourish in adversity. There is often barely a crack in the rock, nor a discernible bed of soil where these plants emerge and cover the landscape with vibrant colour and shimmering movement. They cycle through the seasons, resilient and strong, an emblem of resistance and also often humble in their small, feisty stature. Except the Waratah, robust and sculptural, it stands above them all like a beacon of hope despite the harsh and constantly challenging climate and weather.

I learn so many lessons from the examples set by the unique blooms and plants in the mountains. I marvel at their adaptability, surprised that they show up year after year after fires and floods have battered them. They grow again, sharing their beauty, asking nothing in return.

When I work, I'm not just painting the flowers and the cliffs, I'm painting what they represent to me; a reminder to be patient, wait, open my eyes to what is right in front of me, and never take it for granted.
